Surrounding Diamond Valley Lake and Lake Skinner, four miles to the south, you’ll find more than 13,500 acres of open space forming the Southwestern Riverside County Multi-Species Reserve. The Metropolitan Water District of Southern California helped create the state’s first agreement for multi-species protection in 1992, showing that progress need not be at the expense of the environment. The reserve is home to at least 16 sensitive, endangered or threatened California bird, animal and plant species.

The 5.8-mile North Hills Trail offers views of the surrounding vistas, linking existing pathways with new passageways that minimize environmental impacts. The trail connects two 5-acre trailheads at the northwest and northeast ends of the lake. The west trailhead offers a picnic area and 50 large parking spaces for vehicles and horse trailers, as well as overflow parking. Water for horses is available at the west trailhead.
